the election on Tuesday in the great central States : Total vote cast, Radical majority Pennsylvania-1,520,700

The Radical majority will, perhaps not vary two thousand either way from these figures. In other words, it is less than one per cent, of the aggregate vote

It is argued that in order to found a hope for the election of Seymon; and Blair, it was incumbent on the Democracy to have carried these States by decisive majorities. We cannot see it in that light. On the other hand, to make the Radicals confident of the election of Grant, it was necessary that they should have held their own. This they did not do by from 75 to 100,300 votes. The leaders feel that they have lost. They recognize the necessity of extraordinary exertion to save themselves in November. They know that Grant is not linst, for having committed a rape upon a strenger than the local candidates for white woman. How far the present crop of that coun try will interfere with our sales in British markets will depend on circumstances : but one thing is certain-that we shall be importantly affected by it in several ways. It ill-becomes us to affect an indifference for competition that we agreed to pay. This is exactly the atti- carmot afford, and it is in every respect more sensible for the South to set about recovering her lost cotton status in all earnestness, and with a sincerity that shows her appreciation of the true character of the situation, than for her to rely upon past power for present protection. Affairs have changed, and she has experienced crushing discouragements. Her zed; even worse, it has been destroyed, and she has been forced to devise a new one.
